A more subtle, but equally important, aspect of the problem is that most of the available data on the effects of the various treatments on the growth of the plants is derived from field experiments. In these, the plants will be exposed to the same environmental conditions as those experienced by the plants in the field. This may not be true for all treatments, however, as some treatments will be more frequent than others. For example, when a plant is sprayed with a herbicide, it will receive a dose of the herbicide every time it is sprayed. This may not be true for all treatments, however, as some treatments will be more frequent than others.
